Why we love Chase Distillery

Since 2008, Chase has been bringing farming heritage and provenance back to the centre stage. Using surplus or wonky spuds they grow on their farm to create the base spirit for all their products is a major point of difference compared with many other distilleries. It's sustainable British farming at its very best! Have a taste and see what you think...

A brief history of Pommery

1858, Madame Pommery took over as head of Pommery & Greno after the death of her husband. She based the expansion of her House on the creation of wines unlike any others, with one constant demand: quality pushed to the extreme. Well aware of how important the grapes' origin was to the quality of her wines, over the years she built a collection of the finest vineyards in all of Champagne.

Why do we love Mirabeau wines?

A young English family, The Cronk's, left South West London behind during the heart of the 2009 world financial crisis, to make their dream of making award-winning rosé wines a reality. They have since gone on to win multiple prestigious wine awards and are loving the Provençal life.

Why we love Cornish Orchard cider?

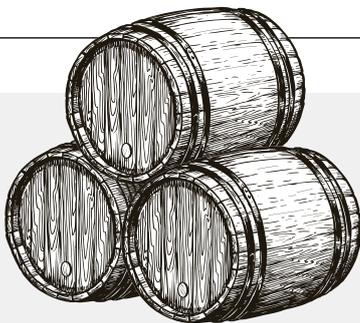

Cornish Orchards use freshly pressed apples that have been grown around the South West of England (Somerset, Devon and Cornwall), on the Duchy of Cornwall Estate. All apples continue to be hand-graded and pressed on site.

They never force the fermentation period using temperature-control technology. Instead, they harness the cool, ambient temperatures of Cornwall's winter months for maximum fermentation time, yielding high-quality flavour.

Rum is used in preparation for the final stages of malt whisky maturation. After initial use, the rum is often sold on or even disposed of. Discarded has repurposed this spirit and infused it with banana peel, which provides fresh toffee notes with a fruity balance that perfectly complements the complexity of the base rum.
